

Integrating Oilseeds into Diversified Agriculture

Tuesday, July 24, 2012, 3:00 p.m. to 6:00 p.m.

Wood's Market Garden is a fruit, vegetable & flower farm and seasonal market in Brandon, Vermont. The farm consists of 150 acres of Vermont farmland and woods. The farm is owned and operated by Jon and Courtney Satz. Currently, over 50 kinds of vegetables and fruits are grown on 60 acres of sandy loam soils. The farm has been growing organically for over 10 years and also has 7 greenhouses for raising bedding plants, ornamentals, and vegetable starts. Over the last few years the farm has been working to incorporate oilseeds into the vegetable rotation. This season Jon has 15 acres of sunflowers and soybeans being grown for oil and meal. The soybeans were drilled into winter rye stubble, either flail mowed or after straw harvest. Learn about Jon's experiences growing oilseeds in rotation with vegetables. Observe several pieces of weed control equipment including a Hinkiker high resolution cultivator. Lastly, we will learn about the new BioBurner being used on the farm to heat greenhouses. The BioBurner has the capability of turning many products into heat including oilseed meal, wood chips, grains, and many other biomass materials.
