

because each seed has a story seeds have really become the greatest teacher of my life I'm gonna talk about tea processing join us for a conversation about Southeastern seeds no matter where you're from or what culture you're from you don't have to go back that many generations to find a farmer in the family there is some very new need if you are going to be a good seed saver what's in a name if they have the same genius and the same species and they will interbreed most the traditional Farmers they weren't just Farmers they were Pharma breeders the reason we even have food to this day is because all those people whose hands we don't even know they pass through you know is the reason we have food here clean your house clean grandma's house and Granny see if you can like find one because if just one will grow There's Hope what we are doing right now is not about us but about the generations that will follow us save your seeds seed saving is a practice that's as old as farming yet today few Farmers save their seeds in this series we'll talk with a diverse group of Southeastern farmers and learn how to save their most important crops and that is food for my ancestors right there you know